The Lihue Store Display

One of the most fascinating places on Kauai just now, is the Lihue Store, dressed in its Christmas holiday attire. Beautiful show cases filled with pretty Christmas presents, busy clerks (but not too much so to be extremely polite) and an artistically decorated Christmas tree over which Santa Claus himself stands guard, combine to impress one with the fact that Christmas is nearing.

The management has very thoughtfully placed the display in the most convenient manner possible for his patrons. To the right as one enters, a beautiful, extensive line of pictures and calendars are prettily displayed. Directly in the center, stands for new glass show cases which contain an excellent assortment of specially selected Christmas goods four special tastes. Toward the rear, and to the left, stands a magnificent glass show case wherein is displayed an exquisite line of silverware, cut glass and valuable China.

Through a door to the right, one passes into the toy department where one of the greatest assortment of toys on the island is receiving the scrutiny of scores of happy little souls.

Mrs. A. Klussman, wife of Luna Klussman of the Lihue Plantation, returned Wednesday from a visit among friends in Honolulu.

A. G. Hime, head book-keeper for Kekaha, returned from a business trip to the city on the Kinau,

YELLOW FEVER NEAR KAUAI?

It was early morn on the good ship Kokua, Captain Swanson, and as she rode the mighty billows which separated her from the Garden Island, she glided along with the speed of an Atlantic greyhound. The doughty captain was busily pacing the bridge in a manner which at once indicated that he had received a premonition and that the mysterious enveloped his thoughts.

It was plainly evident to the passengers that he had scented trouble and many were the surmises among them on that memorable morning. "The captain may be expecting the Japan fleet," said a military man. "Or, a Chinese revolution," chimed in another, while the third who had been deeply engrossed in a treatise on "Small Farming," by one Starret, raised his eyes until they met the captain's gaze and noted therein the positive doom of the ship. "Captain!" said he, "how far is it to land?" "Heaven only knows, my man," sighed the captain, "and what's more the ship's a boo-doo. Why man, can't you see the ship's running away? She's making at least six knots per hour, and if she keeps up this speed, we're liable to land where your vegetable seeds will suffer from excessive heat."

The captain had not said so much at one time in all his forty years on the "flag ship" and being a very modest man felt so much grieved at himself for such an outburst of prattle that for a short time he disappeared from the bridge. A streak of grey on the eastern horizon greeted his watchful eye when he resumed his position on the bridge and taking up his usual "pace" he became wrapt in a deep reminiscent mood when finally "Ship Ahoy!" came from the watch. The captain with the aid of his glass discerned at some distance to the left, a large dark object which loomed out of the water and gradually assumed the appearance of a wrecked vessel.

Feeling that his premonition was about to materialize, he pointed his vessel full steam ahead towards the object. "Could it be that Hanalei wharf?" thought he.

But now the good ship had shortened the distance so much as to allow a better view of the situation. Taking another look, he discovered a number of small red flags fluttering in the breeze. "Yes," thought the brave captain, "it must be a wreck, else why the flags of distress?" Those were certainly trying moments for the skipper as well as for the now excited crew and passengers who had crowded about, eager to be in on the finish.

The finish came however, sooner than expected, for old Sol who had apparently been awakened by the excitement, came quietly out of the watery horizon, and after a blink or so, smiled on the "wreck," which proved to be nothing less than a large shipment of Honolulu bananas.

"How about the red flags? Oh," said the captain, "an investigation proved that each had been held by yellow fever mosquitos. They had evidently been adrift for sometime and were in their death struggles when discovered their distress signal." "But how did you know they were yellow fever mosquitos?" asked the curious man. "Couldn't have made a mistake," replied the captain, "for one of them possessed a gold watch with Curries monogram on it, another held a photograph of Dr. Ramus in his deadly grasp, while another held injunction papers. Nope you can't fool me, they were the real things."
